Abstract As part of the symposium entitled "School Religious Retreats and Contemporary Forms of Transmission of Faith," held at KUL JP II on 21-22 January 2013, a presentation was delivered by the youth from the Nicolas Copernicus Secondary School no. 9 in Lublin. X The presentation was entitled "Retreats the Way I would like them to be." The author of this article reports on the open round-up of the debate that the youth had participated in their religion classroom before the symposium. The debate gathered nine groups of students, and was conducted with the use of metaplan. The structure of this method also allowed a clear definition of the particular stages in which the youth presented their response to the following questions: How do the youth truly assess the organization and conduct of school religious retreats? (What is the status quo?); What should the retreats look like? (Prognosis); What are the reasons for why the retreats are not what they are expected to be? In the round-up session, the participants got acquainted with the conclusions and postulates formulated by the youth as regards the steps to be taken to make the school religious retreats match the assumptions of the organizers and the expectations of the young participants.
